A major challenge with learning languages is that written language tends to be more formal. Spoken language doesn't always follow the rules. Many native English speakers use grammatically incorrect phrases, such as "I ain't got none," which is fluent and easily understood, but technically "incorrect."

I think that to overcome this problem, you will need to watch as much popular media as possible or spend time in the region where the language is spoken.

Professionals in general tend to speak in more standard language, so it isn't always possible to learn really informal spoken language naturally with a teacher.

Written language is often seen as one of the main challenges for many learners. In contrast, spoken language tends to lack strict grammatical structure. For example, a phrase like “I ain't got none” is commonly used and easy to understand, but it is grammatically incorrect.

Watching popular media or spending time in a region where the language is spoken can help solve this problem. However, standard language is more commonly used by professionals. As a result, it's not always possible to learn informal spoken language from a teacher.
